POLAR BEARS LISTED AS THREATENED

1- Polar bears were listed as threatened species and will receive special protection under U.S. law. In his statement, Secretary of the Interior Dirk Kempthorne noted that the decline of Arctic sea ice is the greatest threat to the bears.

2- Polar bears live in the Arctic sea ice. But sea ice is melting as the planet warms, and it is predicted to continue to do so for several more decades. "Because polar bears are vulnerable to this loss of habitat, they are likely to become endangered in the future," Kempthorne said. Many scientists say that man is directly responsible for that... Hunting of polar bears as a food source by certain native people and trade in native handicrafts made from polar bears will also continue

3- Scott Bergen, a landscape ecologist, released a survey in 2007 that found two-thirds of the world's polar bears could go extinct by 2050. Bergen noted that saving the polar bear will depend on international cooperation. Permanent sea-ice habitat is likely to remain in areas outside of the U.S., particularly in Canada and Greenland. Scientists view these areas as refuges that could allow polar bear to survive and repopulate the Arctic if temperatures decrease and sea ice returns."If you take a long-term view—meaning a hundred-year view into the future," he said, "polar bears' existence is not necessarily totally dependent on what happens in the United States."

According to Professor Norman Myers, "the annual destruction rate seems set to accelerate further, and could well double in another decade...we still have half of all tropical forests that ever existed... The struggle to save the world's rainforests continues, and there is a growing worldwide concern about the issue. However, we need to know why the rainforests are being destroyed to save them." (Myers 1992)
